Accelerating a Labor of Love:
Time to Transform HIV Prevention for Pregnant and Breastfeeding Women

A growing body evidence supports the need to expand biomedical HIV prevention options during pregnancy and breastfeeding, periods known to have increased risk for HIV acquisition for women and their infants. While most biomedical HIV prevention trials have excluded pregnant and breastfeeding women, this trend is starting to change. HIV pre-exposure prophylaxis (PrEP) programs are starting to serve pregnant and breastfeeding women, and the conversation around equitable access for these populations is evolving. Come join speakers working across the globe and the epidemic as we highlight the growing body of evidence, action, advocacy, and ethics around increasing access for pregnant and breastfeeding women to safe and effective biomedical HIV prevention options.
